LIBRARY DIVISION RESOURCES

With more than one hundred and seventy-five thousand books, pamphlets, periodicals and microfilms in numerous languages in its collections, the Library Division provides extensive documentary evidence of the history, lives and struggles of people of African descent. Among the library division's holdings are many rare works, dating from the sixteenth century, by such notables as Juan Latino, Phillis Wheatley, Frederick Douglass and Martin Delany. The collections are particularly strong in the first editions and first works by early twentieth century contemporary writers, including W.E.B. DuBois, Claude A. Barnett, and Alice Dunnigan. Special resources within the division's collection include: theses and dissertations written on Black-related topics by students here at Howard and from across the country; English and foreign language newspapers; journals and magazines which provide current and retrospective examination of the Black diasporic experience; and extensive vertical file collections consisting of thousands of folders of biographical and subject-related ephemeral materials which often serve as the sole source of information on obscure as well as better known people and events.

This bibliography of the black press is divided into three countries: U.S., Africa, and the Caribbean. Within each country, the bibliography is further divided into bibliographies, collected biographies, biographies and reminiscences, books, doctoral dissertations, master's theses, and where applicable, vertical file materials. Journal articles are not listed in this bibliography. References to newspapers or periodicals in book titles are highlighted.

MANUSCRIPT DIVISION RESOURCES

The primary source material of the Manuscript Division offers extensive documentation of African American history and culture, and provides insight into the growth and development of individuals and families, organizations, social and religious consciousness, and the continuing struggle for civil rights and human justice. Organized in 1974 into four departments - Manuscripts, Prints and Photographs, Oral History and Music - these collections complement the resources of the Library Division, and broaden the scope of areas for research on the black experience.

The Manuscript Department contains nearly 200 processed collections, consisting of correspondence, diaries, photographs, writings and memorabilia documenting the life and achievements of such notables as Alain Locke, E. Franklin Frazier, Frederick Douglass, Mary Church Terrell, Anna J. Cooper and Charles Drew. The Prints and Photographs Department makes available for study, research and exhibition over 100,000 graphic images, including photographs, slides, postcards, broadsides, prints and maps. These works date from the 1800s to the present, and feature daguerreotypes, tintypes, stereograph cards and glass plate negatives. The Oral History Department features the Ralph J. Bunche Oral History Collection, which totals over 700 transcribed interviews with many of those who participated in and shaped the civil rights movement. Essential documentation of this critical period in American history is available in this collection. Other oral history collections focus on women, Howard University, African American military history, and the black press. The collections of the Music Department are rich in sheet music and recordings, documenting over 400 composers dating from the 18th century to the present.

MANUSCRIPT DEPARTMENT

Black Press Archives:

The Moorland-Spingarn Research Center is also the repository for the Black Press Archives. Authorized in 1973, the Black Press Archives was a cooperative effort between Howard University and the National Newspaper Publishers Association, whose plan was "to develop an archives at a university where the assembled documentation on the black press could be permanently preserved and made available to scholars, students and the public." As a result of the joint venture, the Center receives more than 200 newspapers currently, and has in its newspaper archives hundreds of titles on microfilm. A second component of the program to document the history of the black press is the acquisition of the office files, personal papers, photographs, and memorabilia of outstanding journalists, cartoonists, editors, and publishers. Many of the collections documenting the black press in the Manuscript Division were acquired as a result of this venture. *Right, George and John Murphy viewing the Black Press Archives, MSRC Collection. ORAL HISTORY DEPARTMENT

The oral history collections are a unique and comprehensive account of African American contemporary history. The Ralph J. Bunche Oral History Collection consists of over 700 oral history interviews on the Civil Rights Movement which capture the voices, thoughts, recollections and interpretations of leaders of the movement, members of its rank and file, supporters, activists involved in related activities, and those who opposed the movement. Many of the voices in this collection are those of journalists, editors, or publishers. Other oral history collections, on a variety of topics, also include interviews of individuals involved in various press activities.

One of the favorite tricks Dr. Martin Luther King, bless his soul, uses quite often is that he constantly calls and says, "Well, Bob, you know, that story that appeared in the papers is not right. I'd like for Jet to tell it like it is." We quite frequently have to go behind the white press in order to try to correct what is being done. *Interview with Robert E. Cabell, George Clifton, 1917-1976

Collection, 1949-1976

5½ linear ft.

This collection includes photographs taken by local photographer, Clifton George Cabell, who studied photography under Robert Scurlock at the Capital School of Photography. During his career, Cabell worked for the Norfolk Journal and Guide, the Washington office of the Pittsburgh Courier, and the Washington Afro-American. Cabell captured the political and social scenes of Washington during the 1950s and 1960s.

Davis, Griffith J., 1923-1995?

7,000 photographs and negatives

This collection documents the social and economic development of many African governments between 1949-1980. Davis worked for several federal foreign agencies including the Agency for International Development. He photographed extensively in Africa, Europe and parts of the United States, however, the bulk of this collection relates to Liberia. Many of the photographs were featured in Davis' articles which appeared in several national publications, including Ebony and the Black Star Publishing Company, a stock photograph agency.

Harper's Weekly

Collection, 1799-1902

Apr. 1000+ images.

This collection contains original 19th century images of blacks taken from illustrated publications, mostly from Harper's Weekly. The majority of the images center around slavery, the Civil War, and Reconstruction. Related to Harper's are small collections of images from other illustrated newspapers including Frank Leslie's, the Illustrated London News, The Graphic, and the Scientific American.

Williamson, Mary O'H., n.d.

"Colored Celebrities Here and There"

Collection, 1930s-1940s

7 linear ft.

During her tenure as a teacher at Cardozo High School, beginning in 1928, Williamson's students collected information on the achievements of blacks in numerous fields, including law, business, entertainment, sports, education, music, and religion. The collection is comprised of clippings, photographs, and pamphlets which are arranged alphabetically within the field categories. Many of the clippings are from local newspapers and magazines, such as Flash!; and a number of images were taken by local news photographer, Robert M. McNeill.

HOWARD UNIVERSITY ARCHIVES

The Howard University Archives serves as a repository for the official records of the University which include the administrative files of schools, colleges and departments, university publications, Howard theses and dissertations, as well as materials illustrating the contributions of Howard alumni to society. The Archives provides information on the history of Howard University and its important personages, and acquires and preserves University artifacts and memorabilia.
